

How Gratitude Supports Health

Our vision in everything we do is to convey a shared value of compassion, a commitment to excellence, open communications, motivation to be the best, and a sense of personal integrity.

We are honored to care for our residents and share a passion to make their days enriching and fulfilling. It's The Caraday Way!

An apple a day keeps the doctor away.

This age-old adage describes the benefits of practicing good eating habits in supporting your physical health. Well, the same adage can be applied to your mental health as well –

A gratitude a day keeps the blues away.

According to the Mayo Clinic, a daily gratitude practice has been shown to significantly increase happiness and decrease the risk of disease.

Gratitude helps people feel positive emotions, relish good experiences, and deal with adversity. Reflecting on the good and bad builds both character and stronger relationships. It even has the potential to counteract depression and suicidal thoughts. But the benefits of gratitude go beyond that.

Growing evidence supports that people who have more grateful dispositions report fewer health issues than their counterparts. Greater Good Magazine launched an on-line journal program, Thnx4.org, and research showed participants who kept an on-line gratitude journal for two weeks reported fewer headaches, less stomach pain, clearer skin, and reduced congestion.

Similar studies have been performed with people of various ages were consistent in finding that practicing gratitude equates to better health.

Gratitude might even help you sleep better. Sleep is vital to good health and poor sleep puts strain on the body – physically and mentally. Failing to get the proper amount of sleep can lead to cardiovascular problems, and increase your risk of disease and other conditions. Preliminary studies have found that boosting your gratitude can help you catch some zzz's much easier.

All in all, the evidence points to practicing gratitude as a way to improve many aspects of health and life in general. Practicing the fundamental pillar of gratitude can lead to a happier, healthier life.

For more information call 512-641-8805, email us at contact@caradayhealth.com or visit caradayhealth.com